THE GOLDEN ARGOSY

FREIGHTED WITH TREASURES FOR BOYS AND GIRLS

Vol. II.—No. 38. NEW YORK, SATURDAY, AUGUST 22, 1885. Whole No. 142.

THE MOUNTAIN CAVE;

or,

The Mystery of the Sierra Scouts.

By GEORGE H. COOPER.

CHAPTER I.

THE STRANGER PASSENGER.

The stage coach made its way laboriously, for the mud was difficult. It was under the very shadow of the Sierra Scouts.

The passengers were weary, and one somewhat fagged.

Suddenly the general lassitude was forgotten in an general animation.

"It was only two months ago that my fellow-man robbed of all his property," said a bright-faced girl of fifteen, who occupied the left-hand corner of the rear seat.

A fine, manly looking boy, somewhat crowded in the forward part of the coach, raised his head quickly, scanning the fair young passenger with an expression of sympathy.

Every one manifested an eager curiosity, and the gentle stranger looked as she saw what attention she had drawn to herself.

"All his property!" exclaimed a female passenger, to whom the remark had seemed to be addressed. "How sorry I am for you! Was it a large amount?"

"Yes, ma'am; it was very large."

"Was it in gold, miss?" queried a miner.

"Yes, sir; all in gold."

"Way up 'mong the diggings, you say, miss?" put in a second miner.

"Yes, sir."

"All be cuts! That was hard on him."

"It was very hard, sir."

"Robbed, I think you said, miss?" put in a somewhat elderly man who sat next to the boy. "Pray, how did it happen?"

"The gold was on board an express train, sir, and the train was boarded by a band of masked robbers."

"Two months ago? No doubt I must have read of it."

"Yes, sir; it was in all the papers."

"Let's see—two months ago—there are so many such robberies now—two months ago. And your father has—how much did you say?"

"A hundred thousand dollars, sir."

"A hundred thousand dollars! Is it possible!"

"Yes, sir; a hundred thousand dollars in gold."

"Whew!" came from the crowd of passengers, and there was a low whistle as of marvelling from one or two of them. But a something in the young and truly beautiful face was calculated to check the demonstration.

"A hundred thousand dollars in gold!" ejaculated half a dozen voices.

"Every cent of it!" What a dreadful loss!" came from the lady passenger.

"And your father has nothing left?"

"Nothing, madam; he had sold all his interest in the mines, and this was his whole property."

"Heh! I pity you! Oh, if such villains could be brought to justice!"

"I'm like to get my watches on the seven deuce," remarked a third.

"Yes; I remember reading of it," said the elderly man, "and how your father, Mr.—your father, he died it was, Mr.—"

"Mercer," pronounced the girl.

"Yes, yes; how a Mr. Mercer had lost all he possessed. It is a solemn fact such things should be. We know not, I suppose!"

"No, sir; not the least. The robbers were unknown, and nothing is known of them."

"It is a hard case," suggested the elderly man; "there is a great deal of mystery about these robberies."

Or all sides there were expressions of sympathy for the heretofore young girl so suddenly reduced from affluence to poverty. But perhaps the look in the kind, crying eyes of the boy upon the front seat told more than all else.

"Outrageous!" he exclaimed, as if half to himself. "All the earnings of a life-time! Oh, how I would like to beat the villains down!"

"No doubt, no doubt," said the elderly man. "so we all would; but I fear it would prove a very long hunt. Be your name," he said.

"How fearfully gloomy it is getting!" said the lady passenger.

"Yes," replied the young girl; "I hope there are no robbers about."

"I hope so too. So wonder you think of them. I sympathize with you so much, my dear, now."

"Thank you. His innocence. I suppose my father is wondering where Maud is to-night."

"Dicks," thought Walter Dayton, "so her name is Maud. Don't think I shall forget it."

"Hooray, sir! a sniff of a 'ker,'" called the driver from the seat, as if in his innocence and in need of sympathy.

"Sure!" "Oh!" said Maud.

"Dears! For mercy sake!" echoed the others.

"Never fear, ladies," said one of the men, "bars won't baffle a stage."

"Never knowed 'em to," remarked another.

Walter tried to look out from the open window, but he was too far forward to reach it.

"Begin to feel rockish?" asked the elderly man.

"No, sir; only I thought if there was a gentle storm, I would like to see him."

"Your eye into the wrong glove."

"Yes; I thought of that while we were talking about the robbers."

"Well, I wouldn't do you much good, certain or no, if they were to show themselves. Best policy to take it easy."

The horses went very fast for a few minutes, then apparently coming to a steep and long ascent, they slackened their pace to a walk, and the driver and inside could be heard lustily talking both at the same time—"Gimp, gimp, gimp"—as they called up.

The ticket on both sides looked fearfully black, and it was pitch dark in the stage.

The driver still needed all the assistance which the commendations of his lady guide alone could give him, and once or twice he shouted back an exclamatory word or two, loud enough to be heard inside.

"Yes; 'twas primitive back there," he would, "'Gimp!'" and his whip cracked like a pistol. "Need a mule—I'll have it—I'll have it! 'Gimp!'"

"How long have's what that driver was killed a year ago?" he concluded to say, experimentally? "The robbers hid in——"

But the sentence was left unfinished. A terrible uproar reigned outside.

"Hold up!"

What a cry it was! Fast trampled, pistols clicked, and the rays of a dark lantern fell full upon the front of the stage. The horses reared and swerved aside, then came to a final stand. There were strong hands upon the bits.

The men grasped their pistols, the lady passenger screamed, and from the dark corner where the young girl was huddled there came piercing sounds that showed how dreadfully frightened she was.

Walter thought of his gun on the top of the stage. Oh, if he but had it here!

"Be still," said the elderly man, "just cool—do anything. See what they want."

But even as he was clutching his pistol, by the boy's hand twisted the barrel so he could find his position.

In a moment, however, it could be seen how vain was any show of resistance. Three or four rifle muzzles were pointing in at each of the opposite doors of the stage, and the driver was already standing on the ground, a helpless prisoner.

Three of the passengers who had weapons surrendered them, and then the whole group, one after another, descended. As they did so they were flanked by the masked robbers and passed between the rifle muzzles.

"Let's get the drop on 'em, and it can't be helped," remarked the elderly man gravely, as he looked around upon his captors.

The scene, as revealed by the lantern glare, was a confused and strange one. Here and there a captive was led aside from the others and roughly interrogated. Especially was this the case with the elderly passenger, who appeared to receive very early treatment.

Walter could see the stage thoroughly overhauled, and among other things, his expressly packed rifle taken from its place to be examined and admired. It was a birthday present from his father, and he would not have parted with it for a thousand dollars.

For most of all, the boy's attention was directed to poor little trembling Maud; for he

THE CONDUCTOR OF YOUTH.

[illegible] he [illegible] to Walter Dayton, and you are not on a long vacation, as you say."

"Yes, sir; I shall not go home for some time."

"Has your father ever suffered from these robberies that are nowadays taking place?"

"Yes, more or less; to the amount of a few thousands; but his loss has been nothing to compassion as Mr. Mercer's. And he made another look at the girl's pretty face.

Twilight was now closing around, and the stage had still far to go. The road seemed to grow wilder as evening shut down, and a sense of insecurity was apparent among the passengers.

"Brought your gun along, I presume?" said Walter's elderly friend. "Boys generally love shooting."

"Oh, certainly—wouldn't come along without my rifle; it's stowed on the top of the stage—a repeater, and a very good one, I think."

There he guessed that she might be motherless, because nothing was said of her mother. And he wondered that the woman did not ask her about it, or improve her acquaintance. But he finally concluded that she might have told as much without his hearing it, before she spoke of the robbery.

"A hundred thousand dollars in gold!" murmured a passenger in the darkness, as if he had been dwelling upon that idea from the first. "That was a big job!"

And Walter guessed him to be the same miner who had called it "a big job" once before.

"Any dust in yesterday aboard this stage?" queried another voice.

"Like enough—reckon the' may be."

"Guess I'm thinking," said the first, "that we're a-going into a nice place to unload it, of 'tis so. Twice of road agents o'nights—"

"Hurry! what's back!" said the woman.

"Does not all the stage upset!" asked poor little Maud, plaintively.

"Hooray, sir! a sniff of a 'ker,'" called the driver from the seat, as if in his innocence and in need of sympathy.

"Sure!" "Oh!" said Maud.

"Dears! For mercy sake!" echoed the others.
